It was a vision of musical stardom as a Detroit teen that inspired Mary Wilson to co-found one of the most successful female singing groups in recording history – The Supremes. Mary was the only Supreme who remained with the group from the beginning in 1959 (when the group was known as The Primettes) to the very end when the group disbanded in 1977. With the Supremes, Mary Wilson had the distinct honor of charting TWELVE Billboard Number One singles, more than any other Motown Group, including the hits “Someday We’ll Be Together,” “Stop! In the Name of Love,” “Come See About Me,” and “Baby Love.” Not only were they the second most successful singing group of the 1960s—surpassed only by the Beatles—but they remain the most successful female singing group of all time.

Since then, Wilson has gone on to be a part of dozens of hit records, has written a best-selling autobiography, performed on stage and screen, lectured and toured the world, and continues to be looked up to as a singer who set the standard for females in the recording industry.
